

A woman of this city who was very anxious to go to the Colonial ball, and had her costume all ready, and she knew it very becoming, and consequently wanted to wear it, was greatly disappointed when she heard that the ladies who had the ball in charge had decided to postpone it till later in the season. While in this disappointed mood she said that for her part that she thought the "charity business in this town was entirely overdone." This same woman rides in her carriage and has from two to three servants, and often four in her house. She can wear her sealskin garments and a silk dress to do her shopping if she feels inclined. Such a woman can have no real appreciation of the condition of the poor, when she can go from her room to a fine breakfast, dinner or luncheon, and have it comfortably served, and in style, and be invited out to partake of the luxuries of the land at the tables of her friends and acquaintances and offer them the same at another time. All she sent to her husband and paid without remonstrance. This woman, who is almost surfeited with the luxuries of life, thinks that the charity work is overdone. The workers in the charity societies know whether there is no longer any call for aid been asked a great many times for contributions for the poor. Perhaps she is selfish and likes to spend her money as she pleases, spend for persons who are in absolute need. There is a true saying that one who would appreciate happiness must first know sorrow. This woman has probably never known anything but the care of doting parents till she was married, and has been fortgood care of her now as she ever had. In the season of Thanksgiving, which is so near, it will be well to be thankful that there are but rare instances where any one thinks that there is too much charity. Indianapolis is noted for its charities, and
